

Especially for children who want to learn English.

Some children are so insecure about communicating in English that they speak very softly or unclearly or sometimes don't even dare to speak at all.

When a child speaks unclearly, the other English skills (such as vocabulary, sentence structure and morphology) are not recognizable because people simply can't understand what the child is saying.

The English Sounds

There are some English sounds and sound combinations that are especially difficult to pronounce for children who are learning English as a second language. The difficult sounds may differ according to the child's first language.

The correct use of word stress, sentence stress, intonation and rhythm help increase speech intelligibility.

Multilingual children sometimes don't hear the difference between certain English sounds because the sounds don't exist in their first language. You can keep repeating the sounds in English, but it won't help. There is a special strategy for this.

Using incorrect breathing when speaking can also cause problems in speech. Some children are not used to using long words or sentences in their first language. Their breath runs "out" when they are halfway through a word or sentence in English.

Sometimes long words or sentence constructions cannot be remembered and therefore cannot be pronounced properly. This can cause them to have difficulties in learning new words and sentences.
